TIS-East Family Shares their Love of Learning Through the 5th Annual STEM Fair

The gym was full of students preparing the final touches for their presentations. Families, teachers, fellow students and volunteer science fair judges eagerly awaited to hear about their scientific discoveries. Dorjan Scott and Siu Yan Scott have volunteered at The Intergenerational School-East since their son started attending kindergarten in 2014. With their background and passion for science, the entire Scott family, including former TIS-East Refining Teacher, Patricia Scott, has played a big part in making the STEM Fair happen for five years.

During the weeks leading up to the STEM Fair, Mr. Scott volunteered his time to come into the school and help prepare supplies for students to use in Mr. Crook's STEAM classes. Mr. Crook led Developing, Refining and Applying Stage classes through lessons that involved applying the scientific method to research and testing for projects. Students used the ideas, methods and materials Mr. Scott prepared to help develop their own hypotheses and record their findings to share at the STEM Fair.

Mr. Scott gathered friends, families and volunteers with backgrounds in the sciences to help judge projects at the event. Judges included current and former TIS-East teachers, friends and colleagues in aerospace engineering, clinical research, and many other STEM fields, as well as other TIS-East families and staff.

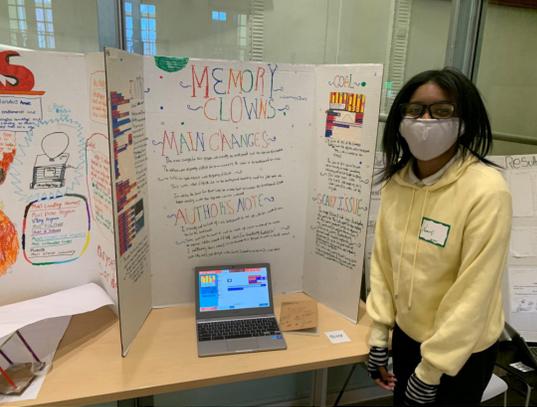

While it was the students' ingenuity and curiosity that shines in the STEM Fair, Mr. Crook and Mr. Scott set the stage for this display of boundless learning. The showcase and celebration of all these efforts came together through the diligent coordination of Mr. Scott, and his team of volunteers to host the STEM Fair. In sharing his passion in ways that unlock student potential and reinforce in-class lessons, and in providing consistent support to bring a community together around a major initiative like the STEM Fair, Mr. Scott and volunteers like him are a vital part of The Intergenerational School's community as we strive towards lifelong learning.
